Moisinel, his business that of commission merchant in dry goods sun-dries, his age three and forty years, the age of per-fidious agitations and demoralizations. Yet, nevertneless, he had a charming wife, "his Adele," as he still

And why should he not have called her thus? She was only twenty-five years old, and they had been married scarcely eighteen months, and she possessed a singularly enticing and bewitching style of beauty with her red cheeks, blue eyes and raven hair. So enticing and bewitching that Moisinel had taken her without a sou of dot. As chance would have it, precisely in the same building where he had his own apartment, there was, on the first floor, a large and fashionable dressmaking establishment, whose specialty was the exporting of fine robes to foreign shores, entailing the necessity for handsome models, or "tryers-on," to use the phrase of the trade.

Sixty odd work girls and mosels daily flitted up and down the stairs at* lunch time and dinner time, with the buzzing and chattering of a flock of crows, The Devil is always obliging in leading one to his fate. Moisinel, among the sixty-odd little ouvrieres, remarked many possible pleasures.

He ended by stopping one. A brunette, with dark, sparkling eyes, hair that-but you have no need of an exact portrait, I suppose. It is not you that are going to escort her to a private cabinet of some to-be-named restaurant the first Sunday evening of the month of May.

Need I tell you, also, that the acquaintance had followed its usual course-there being so much incline, you see, in games like this. They had had a tender though passing conference, and decided that on the Sunday in question they would go, not to a cafe first, as planned, but to the opening of the violet season at Chaville; and as the days were still too cool to dine in the fields they would return to Paris in time for a little fete at the Cafe Riche.

regulate. Ah! but that was a very delicate one, indeed. Moisinel quailed whenever he thought of it. How was he going to free himself for that promised Sunday of emancipation? He had fallen into the habit of taking with Adele a dinner en famille on that evening. His mother-in-law came; her aunt, also, and Adele's before him-No. 18! And Moisinel, as brother-in-law and sister. Moisinel, who was not of the nimble wit essential to the prompt fabrication of a reasonable romance, took a whole week to meditate and to evolve a story of sufficiently ingenious complications.

At last he elieved that he had it.

The stage was set to a nicety-it remained only to play the comedy! To play it before whom? Before "his Adele," who thought him so faithful and true! It was truly abominable, the thing that he was going to do, still he took his courage in both hands and Saturday morning after breakfast, preceding the Sunday agreed upon, he began to unfold his little

"Adele, dearest," said he, "to-morrow is going to be a very, very dull day for me, indeed, my little one. That Buenos Ayres correspondent of

"Eh," said Adele, surprised. "Sunday a dull day for you, Etienne? How and why?"

"As I said, that Buenos Ayres correspondent of mine-a man through whom I make fully 20,000 francs a year-figure to yourself that he knows nothing at all of the Versailles Musee, the Bois nor anything else, in fact, of Paris, and he has got it in his head that I shall serve him as showman, elephant driver, you know, my dear."
"You Etienne?" Adele exclaimed, still more amazed. "None other, dearest; and you must not forget that I make through him 20,000 france at least a year. I have tried to get out of it; told him where and how to go, but he took it badly, and seeing him vexed I was obliged to give in. He consented, however, not to start till 2 o'clock. He wanted at first to take the early train, as well as stay over the evening for the fete and the illuminated water. It is the first the news.

of the season, you know, darling. It's sure, almost, to rain; and I certainly risk a serious pneumonia, but for 20,-000 francs; and for once, at any rate, I am bound to go with him." "Do as you think best, dearest.

Business before everything, always. Only you will not return too late?" "No, at 12 o'clock, sharp. The last train leaves Versailles at 11. He'll hold, to a dead certainty, that fellow, to seeing everything to an end."

"But for such a good client one must endure it." "How good you are, darling! But you will not be lonesome. Happily your people will be with you to keep you company." "No, I should only miss you the more. I shall go to mamma, I think, for the evening, if you do not mind." "A happy thought, my Adele! Have you no others, perhaps?" And thus the brigand cajoled and embraced her, and the delicate little point that had given Moisinel such trouble and pondering to properly arrange had arranged itself in the twinkling of an eye and without the slightest hitch or difficulty.

Sunday arrived; the program decided upon was agreeably carried out by Moisinel-the trip to Chaville for violets first; the dinner, later on, at the Cafe Riche.

A dinner very jolly and familiar, the pretty little dressmaker was full of spirits and gay jokes, and the dinner and the jokes were both well washed down with plenty of good wine, which added considerably very naturally, to the ordinary spirit of such occasions.

But this was not the only consequence of the washing down. The wines of the Cafe Riche and other restaurants of its kind are fully as high in price as they are excellent in quality. Moisinel's stock of small bills was soon exhausted. He was a prudent man; a thousand-franc note was too big a sum to trust to the hands of a garcon he did not know; briefly, he must go himself to the cashier's desk to change it to coin, merely an absence of a minute or two from his charmer's side.

And firm in the thrifty and cautious habits of a lifetime of business exactitude, and in spite of the brunette's chaffing suspicion that he intended to leave her in the lurch there to foot the bill, Moisinel held to his determination and the door of cabinet 18 temporarily closed upon him. In the interval, while changing his bill, Moisinel was busily thinking, mentally drawing contrasts between the plump brunette and "his Adele" not entirely favorable to the former. She was distinctly a little vulgar with her loud laughter and still louder an-It was not "his Adele" that spoke a language like this-"his Adelei" and

He had had enough of it already. He would never recommence, never, on his word of honor! All the same, he must now return to the little one; he was not the vicomte of ner friend or the workshop, no! And the cabinet-ah, behold it he spoke, turned the handle. Three cries simultaneously resounded. The first from the waiter, who, too late, clamored: "Stop, stop, please! Monsieur deceives himself! That is not 18, but No. 13!" The other two cries were uttered by the guests of cabinet 13, into which, he found himself, all unwittingly, making this brusque interruption and deranging an obviously very tender interview.

The gentleman had roared: "Sa-a-cre bleu!" The lady shricked: "Ciel! My husband!"

And her husband, for a fact, the lady being no other than "his Adele," thus occupying the leisure time left upon her hands by the springtime fugue of her lord and master. Drawn by the stir and outcry, the occupanta of the other cabinets had run to the spot, and there, among them, ran the little brunette of No. 18.

But the pencil of a simple chronicles renounces picturing the scene that followed. How have they settled it, you ask? In the only way it was possible to settle it-Moismel and his wife have decided to pardon each other; a sort of double-entry case of forgiveness, you know, upon one condition-that each has a day of going out, but the same day, and always together-naturally.

"Jimmy" Hope, the ex-burglar, is living quietly in New York. He is often seen on Broadway, but always alone. A few days ago he was asked if there was such a thing in emistence as a burglar alarm that could be deep pended upon. "Yes," he replied, "a dark house will never be entered by any one but a green horn. Groping about in a house where there is no light is a thing that appalls the boldest housebreaker.
